THE NARRATIVE

Of the Late
FIGHT

BETWEEN THE French & Confederate ARMIES

THe Imperial Forces being Joyned, sometime since, with the Dutch, and Spanish Troops, making in all, a Body of above Sixty Thousand Men, Effective, were drawn up very near the French Army, under the Command of the Prince of Conde which lay Encamped in a very Secure Post; and 'tis supposed, might intend to have declined a Pitch-field, until Turenne, with the Forces lately Employed in the Palatinate had Joyned them; had they not unexpectedly been Surprized in a Battle: The Manner whereof (after several various Reports) is now found, and Confirmed to be thus:

On the First of August, the Confederate Armies designing to pass a River, a great Party of the French taking the Advantage, came unexpectedly forth of a Wood; and fell upon the Rear Guard, consisting of about Nine, or Ten Regiments, for the most part Spanish, whereof the hindermost were those of Holstein, the Regiment of Morber, and the Regiment of the Young Prince of Vandemon. All which, with some others, were miserably shattered; and, for the most part, cut to Pieces in the first Charge of the French Fury; So that the Remainder were forced to Fly: And that part of the Army that was gone over the Ford, made what Haste they could back again, to their Relief, the whole Army making Head as fast as the Inconvenience of the place, which was very troublesome, and uneven, would Permit:

In This Defeat of the Rear, the Prince of ORANGE Carriages were Surprized, but as they were Carrying them off; A strong Fresh Party of the Dutch came in, which after a sharp dispute, were compelled to retreat by a Body of six Thousand Horse sent in by the Prince of Conde, who in a very short time were met by a Party of our Cavalry, and most furiously engaged, and now the Generals on either side drawing up with all possible speed, and lending Reliefs to their respective Friends, the Cross of both Armies came to a smart and most cruel Engagement, nothing of Courage or Resolution being omitted on either hand: The adverse Troops breaking into and through each other, and the Generals often mingled amongst the common Soldiers of the Enemy; In which confusion the Prince of Orange gave incomparable Testimonies of his Valour and Heroick Spirit, and the rest of the Commanders inspired with an example of such undaunted Gallantry, seemed to brave all dangers, though several of them there unfortunately, yet gloriously fell, dying in Bed of Honour; The Prince of Conde, and grand Officers of the other side, meeting them with an equal Bravery and Resolution, so that the Prince himself had his Horse thrice shot under him, and though at first it was reported he was near slain or wounded, yet we are now satisfied he came off unhurt, though 'tis certainly affirmed, the brave Duke D'Enguin his Son received some wounds in the Face.

The fight continued desperately till mid night, and then after some intermission, was renewed again the next morning, with as much Courage as ever; Both sides acquitted themselves with extraordinary Valour, but especially the Imperial Infantry; Never did Fortune weigh the Issue of a Battel more Nicely; Nor could that of Pharsalia (where Fate Decided the Empire of the World) be bought with a more Sullen Obstinacy.

The first Attaque, began on Saturday, about eleven of the Clock, in the Fore-noon, and continued with all imaginable fury, and horror; except some little respite about midnight, till the same time next day: at which time, both Parties wearied, but not satisfied, seperated from each other, the French Retreating to their Trenches; and though the Confederate Troops may boast themselves to be left Masters of the Field, yet they thought fit also, quickly to repair to their former Posts.

The slaughter in the whole, cannot but be very great, though as to the certain Number, common Fame speaks very differently, according as the Interests, or Assertions of the several Reporters run Byast to either Party. Some relating near twenty Thousand in all slain, though more moderate Computers cannot allow of above half that Number, the Confederates Writing about four Thousand on their side; and near twice as many of the French. But the Paris Letters speak just contrary, though most certain it is, abundance of the Flower of the French Gentry, (some affirm near four Hundred) spurred on by an excess of Gallantry Sacrificed here their lives to Honour. The Account of Persons of extraordinary Quality, stands thus.
